The image is a dense collage of vintage comic book covers, primarily from the mid-20th century. The covers are arranged in a grid-like fashion, overlapping slightly. Titles visible include "Supermouse", "Jetta", "Mystery Comics", "Fantastic Tales", "Cosmo Cat", "Startling Comics", "Strange Mysteries", "Daring Adventures", "Famous Funnies", "Ha Ra", "Teen-Age Sweetheart", "Duck", "Eerie", "Exciting Comics", "Casper Cat", and "Barnyard Comics". Many covers feature classic cartoon characters like Jerry the mouse, Porky Pig, and others. A large, stylized purple speech bubble with a black outline is centered over the collage. Inside the bubble, the text "WEB COMIC UNIVERSE.COM" is written in a bold, white, sans-serif font. The overall aesthetic is colorful and nostalgic, representing a collection of classic comic book art.

TEST of FIRE

IF you travel far enough up the Congo, you'll eventually come in contact with the Ebalas tribe. This may be an experience you'll enjoy; but chances are you will find it just the reverse. The Ebalas are a strange, out-of-place tribe there in the heart of Africa. They do not react to form. They are misfits.

Perry Scott discovered the Ebalas about a year ago, on a mission for the British government. Perry was particularly fortunate in his meeting. At the time, old U-balla, the chief, had been murdered. He had been murdered by his stalwart son, Gan. Or so the medicine man of the village said. He had been murdered because Gan wanted to reign as king, and thus take unto himself all the worldly possessions of old U-balla, which amounted to considerable in the way of cattle and colored cloths.

Old U-balla had several wives, too, but these Gan did not want. But what was to be done with these wives, now that the chief was gone? Of course, they could be killed, or traded to another tribe for cattle, but that wasn't the thing the medicine man cared to do; made bad feelings, and one lost face with the tribesmen to make chattels of barter of the deceased chief's wives. So what was there to be done?

Now it so happens that in the tribe of the Ebalas a widow is looked upon as a sort of pariah by the married women; and as less than that by the marriageable young women. So here was a poser indeed.

It was into this odd situation that Perry Scott wandered about a year ago. The trial of the murderer Gan was to come off imminently. The medicine man, being a good sort and with an eye to publicity, invited Perry to be a member of the jury. Although being on the jury of the Ebalas meant simply nothing, except as a sort of ring-side seat to watch the strange proceedings.

There was a small clearing near the village to which Gan was dragged, and to which the members of the jury and medicine man went. Perry went along.

Gan was brought out into the middle of the clearing and made to sit down beside the medicine man. The latter made some silly passes over his head and on the ground near his feet, all the time muttering incantations to some invisible god. A small fire was built nearby, fed by strips of reddish bark from some poison tree of the jungle.

Then a stone cup with a capacity of about two quarts was presented to the medicine man by a girl. He poured the contents of a gourd into the cup, stirred it, and dropped certain powders into the mixture. A hot coal was then plopped into the cup, which bubbled over and made a great fuss, frothing and sputtering. More hand passes and mutterings.

"You will drink this," said the medicine man, handing the potion to the accused man. The latter took it gingerly, his eyes rolling.

"Drink it," said the sacred man. "And if you are not the murderer, then you will feel no ill. If you are the murderer, then great pains will seize you in the belly. Drink!"

Gan looked around the clearing as if looking for some help. But he found none. The warriors stood around holding wicked spears, their features savage as they regarded this man. Then Gan drank.

He sat a moment after draining the stone cup. Small drums began throb-bing—louder—louder—The old medicine man began a chant, and this was taken up by some of the old women and then the girls. Gan got a horror-stricken look on his face, clutched his fat stomach, and then began rolling on the ground, screaming with pain.

It was all over in a moment. Gan died horribly. They picked up his body like it was something to be fed to the wild dogs and carried it into the jungle. There it was hurled to the ground for the wild beasts to fight over. And that was the end of Gan.

"What was it you gave him?" Perry asked of the medicine man when they had returned to the village. The old man smiled. "Water," he said; "and some harmless cinnamon powder. That is all. Here," he held out some of the powder.

Perry sniffed it. "Cinnamon, all right," he said. "Is that really all you gave him?"

"That is all," replied the sacred man. "You see, had he not been guilty, the stuff would not have harmed him. It is what you whites call psychology. I learned something about it when I went to a white school at the Kenya mission years ago."

Perry nodded. "Then it is all one's imagination, eh?"

The old man nodded. "That is all, Bwana."

And that was the first time Perry had ever watched a lie detector at work. He had heard a lot about their being used, in modern criminal investigation. This was the first instance of its being used by savages. The first Perry Scott had ever seen.

"Pretty good," he comment-

ed. "Then you'd say that the gastric juices and the muscles of the stomach are the things that worked in Gan's case—gave him the lethal cramps? If he hadn't been guilty, then these manifestations would have been absent?"

Again the old man nodded. "Strange are the ways of the gods," he said. "White or black."

And that, Perry felt, was an astute remark. Also, he wondered a bit if cinnamon had actually been all that had constituted that potion.

That first night in camp Perry witnessed a dance such as he had never seen among any tribe, and he had visited many aboriginal tribes throughout the Dark Continent. In the clearing of the village all the young men assembled, dressed scantily, and each painted with weird stripes and blobs of vivid color. A great fire burned in the center and numerous drums were throbbing in the background.

They had set up a huge log in the middle of the clearing, around which the fire leaped, and this was painted to resemble some uncanny monstrosity of man. It was, probably, Perry figured, supposed to be a replica of an enemy of the tribe. The bark had been cleaned off the top of the log and on this smooth surface had been painted the likeness of a horrible face. At a signal, all the men began a dance around the fire, their faces turned toward the log. The old medicine man sat cross-legged near the log, his eyes lifted toward the dark heavens, a strange crooning coming from his thick lips. He scattered, at intervals, a handful of some fine powder over the fire which made it leap up furiously for a moment afterward.

The dancers' tempo increased as the beat of the drums raised and grew louder. The men began a chant, wordless, just a roll of sound that started like a soft wind through the jungle, increasing until it became a howling gale. Perry involuntarily shivered. This was more than he had ever witnessed before; this was different!

Into the firelight suddenly leaped a young girl, even more scantily clad than the men, and she did a whirling dance around the log once. She was followed by another girl, and another, until, as each completed a circuit of the log, many girls were in the dance. The men had not slackened their speed. Soon the entire village was dancing, including the old men and women, who confined their less agile efforts to the outer circle of firelight.

Then from nowhere a rain of long arrows thudded into the face of the log. It became a thing of bristling shafts, and by now the dancers were fairly screaming in a terrible rage. They loosed a volley of heavy hunting spears into the log, not one of them missing its mark, and Perry shivered again. A fat chance an enemy would have getting away from those babies! Their aim was terrifically accurate.

The fire had gnawed into the base of the log, eating away more than half of it. Perry wondered when it would collapse.

Now the leading dancers were leaping into the flames, rubbing their bodies with fire as if they were bathing in it. It did not seem to burn them, yet the smell of scorched flesh was rank in Perry's nostrils.

As rank upon rank of the savages leaped into the fire, taking their flaming ablutions as it were, the first ones began falling to the ground, rolling over and over and groaning. And now Perry could see that many of them had terrible burns on their thighs and other places.

These would roll up to a large circular spot on the ground and dip into a pile of a whitish substance, then rub their wounds vigorously with the stuff. Some of them began crying out in terrible pain. It was only then that Perry discovered that the stuff was salt. They were rubbing their raw burns with salt! Agonizing pain must be the result of such treatment, he thought.

After the whole tribe had gone through this self-inflicted period of torture, a semblance of quiet descended upon the night-filled jungle. Only the moans of the poor devils could be heard. And so Perry found himself sitting shivering with the old medicine man. The latter had a strange grin on his face.

"You see, Bwana," he got out at last, "this is one test that never fails. By their groans do we know who is strong and who is weak. The weak ones we watch. Soon something happens in the tribe, and then we know it was a weak one who fell. Sometimes it is a young man, and sometimes an old one. Less frequently it is one of the girls. Never an old woman."

Perry nodded. He had partly figured it out.

"This then," he said, "is a sort of test, so that you know in the future who to suspect of any crime?"

The medicine man nodded. "It seldom fails. It is based on a law of nature: the weak shall be weak and the strong shall be strong. It helps when something wrong happens among my flock. Also by this method we select our chief. The young man over there who makes no sound"—the old man pointed—"is our next leader. He is badly burned, as you see."

Perry looked. Indeed the youth was almost cooked, his flesh hanging to his thighs in a terrible condition. He kept rubbing salt into the wounds, and Perry knew then what kept infection from starting in that seared flesh. It was the salt. A terrible cure, but a good one.

"Maybe you are right," he said quietly. But he wondered how the white man might undergo such a test.
